A week after reopening a hydropower project on the federal Columbia River Reservation, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is looking for just about anything to do. The agency is asking for project proposals on everything from climate change to entrepreneurship in its annual Corps of Engineers call for work. “We are soliciting proposals for science and technology projects, environmental restoration, engineering and construction projects, and economic and community development projects,” wrote Army Corps of Engineers spokesman David W. Hille. “These may include research, demonstration, testing, or demonstration projects for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, in partnership with other federal agencies or private interests.” Anyone interested in submitting proposals is encouraged to do so at www.corpsenviroscience.com/projects. The deadline is Feb. 1. The agency said the program is part of its 50-year vision, “Restoring the Environment and Community,” which aims to maintain and preserve U.S. waters, forests and shorelines. In an effort to come up with a goal for each of the five regions it covers, the agency has been thinking about a theme for the year. “At this time, we are finalizing the theme and are still formulating the specific goals,” said Hille. “The theme, ‘Forests, Waters and Communities,’ will illustrate many of the Corps’ ongoing efforts to restore forests, improve waters and strengthen communities.” The call for project proposals is part of the agency’s 2015 Landscape Management Plan. The Corps began to solicit proposals for this year’s call in February. A list of themes and respective goals for each was released later that month. These themes include clean water, coastal resilience, oceans, lakes, forests and parklands, and wildlife and natural resources. ◆ 570a42141b
